CRITICAL THINKING TASK

Functions can be compared to a vending machine. The device has parameters (customizability choices) and products (functions) with buttons (function names). Customers, or users, can personalize it by pressing a button to select or perform a function. The machine performs the function, processes the request, and returns the desired product as the result. Users, like customers, enjoy the output without needing to comprehend the vending machine's core workings (code implementation).